Go Down, Moses begins with a 3 paragraph introduction, set off from the rest of the story "Was" by being written as one sentence in Faulkner's high style. Its first four words — "Isaac McCaslin, 'Uncle Ike'" — apparently identify the novel's central character (after this opening, Ike is not mentioned again until the novel's second chapter). Although it notes that the title to the McCaslin ...

In Go Down, Moses, Faulkner's portrait of the post-Civil War South is revealing and thought-provoking. Although the characters were not seriously developed, it was their relationships that appeared to be the focus. This is what makes this book a gem. The majority of the work is readable, but prepare to sweat it out in chapter four of "The Bear", where the stream-of-consciousness steps up and ...
